

The Great Fight.

John Bull and Paul Kruger met in a pub;
John was on business, Paul getting his grub.
Says John you're the man I've been wanting to see
For I have complaints, so now listen to me.
The way you continue to manage your farm
Is not the correct - I hope it's no harm,
To offer a little advice unto you
As how you should manage and what you should do.

Stay, says old Kruger, "by what right I ask
Do you interfere with my daily task?
It cannot be impudence or insanity."
"It's neither," says John, "but surgeranity."
"I deny it," says Paul, "it does not exist."
"It still does," says John, "and I shall insist."
Says Kruger "before I'll submit I will fight."
"O nonsense," says John, "you can't mean it quite."

But Kruger had friends just in the next room,
Who would, he replied, come to his help soon.
He cut short the argument - Sure it's no lie
And lifting his fist, at old John did let fly.
So Paul was the man who started the fight,
John parried the blow, and got home with the right.
Not heavy perhaps, but still 'twas a stinger,
Paul tried in reply a right-handed swinger.

For several ^{rounds} hours the fight thus went on,
Paul very active, determined was John.
Paul jumping here and there and making the pace,
John slower, and getting the worst in the case,
In the sixth round Paul began to swagger
He'd struck so heavily he made John stagger,
And cried "You'll rue the day you bothered with me,
I'll certainly drive you right into the sea."

When Kruger's friends saw he was beating old John,
They laughed in their glee, for oh! it was fun,
To think that John Dull would sink in disgrace,
From the highest unto a very low place.
But John roused himself and got off his coat;
Turned up his sleeves, which was something to note
Got home right and left; and from a favourite lounge
Knocked Kruger a sprawling a regular boonje.
The next round John also led off with a gain
Paul running and ducking and dodging in vain.
John struck him and drove him all over the shop,
Keeping Paul on the run from Hop to Hop,
And kept him still running.

John rushed and hit him and knocked him about;
And once or twice nearly knocked him clean out;
Till Kruger cried out in a terrible fright;
"Oh stop him, mine friends, or he'll murder me quite";
But though he called loud his friends would not hear,
Nor on his behalf would dare interfere;
For John was a terror as each of them knew,
When thoroughly roused he'd fight all the crew.

The fight thus went on, Paul oft on the go,
John following up with many a blow.
Full many a blow did Paul strike in despair,
Such as all fighting laws declare as unfair.
"Now, yield ye," says John, "and own your defeat."
"No, never," says Paul, "with you will I treat,"
But will fight to the end as long as I'll stand,
Or am able to strike with the left or right hand."

"All right, then," says John, "since such is your vow,
To the end let it be, and God help you now."

So they at it again, in the usual style,
 Paul standing a minute, then running a mile
 Thus they've been fighting for many a day,
 For Corn Paul is smart at getting away,
 And John cannot catch him - Paul is so clever.
 Perhaps they'll continue this fighting for ever.

Mother's Prayers.

By CAPTAIN JACK CRAWFORD.

In the dreary hour of midnight,
When the camp's asleep and still,
Not a sound save rippling streamlets
Or the voice of whip-poor-will,
Then I think of dear, loved faces
As I steal around my beat—
Think of other scenes and places,
And a mother's voice so sweet.

Mother, who in days of childhood
Prayed as mothers only pray,
"Guard his footsteps in the wildwood
Let him not be led astray;"
And when dangers hovered o'er me,
When my life was full of cares,
Then a sweet form passed before me
And I thought of mother's prayer.

Mother's prayers—ah! sacred memory;
I can hear a sweet voice now,
As, while on her death-bed lying,
With her hand upon my brow,
Calling for a Saviour's blessing,
Ere she climbed the golden stairs—
There's a sting for all transgressing
When I think of mother's prayers.

And I made her one dear promise—
Oh! thank heaven, I've kept it, too;
Yes, I promised God and mother
To the pledge I would be true;
Though a hundred times the tempter
Every day throws out his snares,
I can boldly answer "No, sir!"
When I think of mother's prayers.

And while here I tell the story
Why my boyhood's days were sad,
Is there not someone before me
Who will make a mother glad—
Swell her heart with fond emotions,
Drive away life's bitterest cares?
Sign and keep the pledge for mother;
Heed thy mother's earnest prayers.

Oh! my comrades, do not drink it;
Think of all your mother said
While upon her death-bed lying—
Or, perhaps, she is not dead?
Oh! don't kill her, then, I pray you,
She has got enough of cares;
Say you won't, and heaven will help you,
If you think of mother's prayers.

An Enigma.

A character well known in Europe, I'm found.
Wherever fair science and learning abound.
In every tongue has my value been shown,
And each universally claims me her own.
Ever true to the hour, I on lectures attend,
And the studies of youth at all times I befriended.
With judges and counsel I travel about
And in every circuit am heard in the rout;
Support the poor culprit, though oft in a fury,
Engag'd in a squabble with justice and jury.
In the midst of a court uncorrupted I'm seen,
Appointed in honour to wait on the Queen;
Conspicuous in splendour, in beauty, and youth,
Yet never deficient in candour and truth.
Seek me not in great cities, I cannot dwell there
Never seen in the theatre, ball-room, or fair.
In the country you'll find me in June and July;
But to Autumn remarkably partial am I.
In rustic seclusion I love to be found,
Mid fruits in abundance distributed round
I hate the cold season, its frost, and its snow;
I can't stand in pattens; in clogs I can't go!
But a word to the wise is sufficient, they say,
So one only hint more shall my nature betray -
Go wherever you will. I am still in the south,
And walk backwards or forwards I'll be in your mouth.
